j_ball430IRON-FARTA fertilized egg will eventually become a person, but until it is born, or until the fetus is mostly developed or something, I won't consider it a person.

An embryo is an underdeveloped human being. The genetic code is there. If you say that it's not a human because it's not developed completely, then half of the people on these forums are not human. Yes, the people on these forums are functioning outside their mother's womb and have taken a recognizable form of a human, but they're still not fully developed.

I didn't say completely. Until they are a person. Well "person" is a sort of vague description. I'll rephrase that. I won't consider it human unless it can feel, move and think. An embryo or fertilized egg can't do that. Fetus or newborn can. Until it can do those things, I don't care if it dies.
