Not here.

I've had an ALMOST polar style of learning, one might say - My first school (3-12) WAS a "Bible-belt" school, so to speak - Services every day, Holy Communion on a Wednesday, and the Religion lessons were very much "God exists, he created the world, now pray" type.

(13-Present) Has been not the opposite, but certainly different. Moved to a grammar school - a school funded by the state. We have a "collective act of worship" once a week that certainly is Christian, but otherwise the style of religious teaching is:

"Let's have a look at all the religions, how they worship, what they believe, and how they act".

Beg pardon, I don't see how I'm being indoctrinated to hate other religions.

True, my edu-ca-shun system is different to yours, but I do not think I can be accused of hating religion, and I am IN that "public school system" you speak of.
