WeirdoOntopic:
I've just tryed out oprea and from what I see at first sight, note that both my installations are completly fresh, is that the interface of opera has a lot more buttons on the main page. Making a lot less room for the website. Also the fact that there are so many buttons already on the outside, makes it look a little less appealing to me.

I might keep opera on it for some time to check it out.

That basicly just means there are less things checked in the View menu on installation for FireFox than for Opera... It has no effect on how the browser actually operates. You could go check everything in the firefox/IE view menu and it would take up lots of space too. The only things I have on my toolbar are my tabs and the address bar(which has google search and little back/forward buttons on the same line).

I personally chose Opera so I don't have to type in 7-15 URLs each time I open it. I browse a lot of sites, and Opera will save them all for me when I close it. The tabbing system is just much better in my opinion. Sure I've heard you can get plugins and extentions that will do the same thing for firefox, but why waste my time find, downloading, installing, and setting up those when it's all right here for me already?
