JohnDoe wrote on Fri, 19 May 2006 01:571. Blue-Ray is definitly going to catch on.

Blu-Ray is expensive, non-rewrittable, and has shit movies for it. Why bother?

JohnDoe wrote on Fri, 19 May 2006 01:572. Your Aeon Flux comparison doesn't make any sense at all. A Blue-Ray player in itself is very useful to have, you don't even need to play games on it. DVD extras however are just minor additions to the movie and if the movie sucks, they won't be interesting either.

It makes perfect sense. If I want a Blu-Ray player, I'll buy a Blu-Ray player, as opposed to buying a PS3. All the PrevGen Consoles played DVDs in theory, but they didn't play CDs, MP3 CDs, Music DVDs, or even my ultimate Queen collection I got off eBay. I ended up getting a plain old DVD player and all of the above worked fine.

JohnDoe wrote on Fri, 19 May 2006 01:573. How do you know that the games are going to suck? I mainly play sports games and I'm very happy with my PS2. Go for the Nintendo if you want your kiddy games or go for the XBOX if you want to play shooters with a gamepad and I'll just go for the PS3.

I'm not sure if you're aware of this, but E3 recently passed, which means I can be reasonably sure of all the games coming out for the PS3 for the next...oh...6 months or so? They showed Hack-N-Slashes, two Final Fantasys, Warhawk, and a trailer MSG4. Yawn.

<Opinion>
Oh, and sports games are terrible. The exception is the Blitz series, which is actually fun.
</Opinion>