I went through that experience with a friend's computer just before school got out. It was a pain all the way back when I used Norton in the days of Win95/98... getting that program scoured off his XP Pro machine made getting rid of AOL software seem like a simple click & drag operation, and that stuff is notorious for its tenacity.

Even McAfee would be preferable to Norton... at least that dies when you terminate all its processes, and it doesn't feel the need to inform you every five seconds, with pop-ups, that you disabled it.

I've had pretty good results using Grisoft AVG on my lappy... I've resolved to never again use pay software. The loss is not worth the gain.
