Ridiculous topic.

The UK is our best and most valuable ally.

Both sides have points in discussing history here, but quite frankly this is purely a matter of opinion.

The very fact that 200 years after a massive conflict between our nations we are reconciled and work together so well is a testament to civilization and the free world.

Of all nations, Britain gets my undying respect for their quality of character and hardiness as well as their dignified stance in the face of annihilation.

You should think twice before insulting a nation that stared down the most aggressive and dangerous European empire in the last 2000 years.

Likewise, America should get credit for the role it has played in that same conflict.

Democracy and freedom in it's current iteration hinges on the success of our nations.

Why don't we discuss something with more meaning like:

Why is Putin reverting Russia's fledgling democracy to communist nationalism and what are the implications of their rotting nuclear infrastructure on world stability.
