In addition to this, I also was enlightened to another question -- what makes a person any religion?  I don't consider myself a Christian, yet my friend who does consider himself to be asked me this:

You've read the bible (yes) -- so, would you say you liked what jesus ("the word" in islam btw) spoke to the people about? I answered yes.  He then called me Christian -- something I would never really consider myself?

What makes a Muslim? A Christian?  A Buddhist? etc?  You go to a specific place of worship at some given time?  Your parents told you that you are?  You've read a holy book and now you "belong"?

I find it sad that people are quick to erect curtains around ourselves to segregate "us" versus "them" because it is easier to classify our enemies in to a group rather than see our similarities.  Can I not be a Muslim and a Christian at the same time?  If you think about this, then you will realize how asinine the idea of not being a religion means we should die/be raped/etc.  Don't give in to fear -- it is a powerful tool of control used very effectively by "them" and "us"
