CarrierII wrote on Tue, 06 October 2009 16:02 Why does that give him the arbitrary right to pick which communities live? (Yes, it really is that dramatic, look at BC, for example) The point is that at any point, any server can be consigned to a lower ranking because Jelly wants to (Not that he has done that, AFAIK, and if he has, I don't want that to become a part of this thread. Take it elsewhere, let us assume for now he hasn't) and that alone is not fair. First come first served doesn't justify the control over which communities get to have players. That's like saying whoever is older gets to have the top spots... first come first served is not a mandate to any power. Hence stable, democratic societies.

Except it was a matter of registering nicknames to play an online multiplayer game with, not with which to construct empires. I agree that it sucks to get the short end of the straw, but Jelly used entirely legitimate channels to get to where he has; why should anybody receive the right to reverse that?
