The only good reason I heard was all the plugins, and that's just because the users made them - they could have easily congregated to another browser instead.

Because back in the day it was pretty much just IE and Firefox being the only popular browsers. Similar to PC vs Macs right now.

Then Chrome came along. It lacked some features of Firefox though, so people still like Firefox. Though, with Chrome having plugins now, I'm gonna wait until it gets a good noscript and adblock plugin to switch.

Just to point out...

The screenshot shows the 'Privacy' section of the Google Chrome Options window. It includes 'Content settings...' and 'Clear browsing data...' buttons, a note about web services, a 'Learn more' link, and several checked checkboxes for navigation suggestions, DNS pre-fetching, phishing protection, and usage reporting. A 'Network' section is partially visible at the bottom. A blue sidebar on the right lists 'Content Settings' with 'Cookies' selected, and 'JavaScript' and 'Do not track' options. A 'Reset to defaults' button is at the bottom right.
