First off I would define "sin" as anything that The Bible says is wrong. Of course if you don't believe in The Bible or God for that matter, than none of that even matters. As I said I didn't want to debate truth in either.

I wasn't saying homosexuals should be denied the right to have kids because they could not make them themselves, I am sure there are many homosexual couples that are more than capable of raising kids to be functional and productive members of society (even better than some heterosexual couples).

That was more along with the "natural" part, as in nature doesn't allow for them to make kids together, so a lot of people would see it as they are not supposed to have kids...

I hope you don't think I am "dodging" questions here, but I don't see any point in discussing the truth in the religion part. I just wanted to say a couple reasons why I would expect some believers to be for or against homosexuality in response to Zimmer's comment.