shippo wrote on Sun, 17 April 2011 18:25eh i was trying to get at the point that evolutionists don't have a very good explanation of how life came from non life.

acording to evolution, each animal decends from a less complex organism this ultimatly leads however to the problem of how life originated.

yes, it does, and abiogenesis is the most plausible theory so far advanced.

Quote:food for thoght: if 4.6 billion years ago the earth is formed (made up of water and rock) and you get some molecuels that form and create amino acids, DNA and a cell, you sill have to consider that this all came form, esentially rock or mineral.

milller urey experiment proved that organic material can arise from inorganic matter. but don't say "this all came from" as if the person next door's grandfather was a lump of granite tradition or other sorces are not to be accepted in place of the Bible.

why do you think that?
