While not unified you can do <startbutton> <arrow down> and select what you're searching for that way. If that's the only problem...

Doing that just selects the second tile on the screen, not what I want.

Omar007 wrote on Fri, 30 November 2012 14:56 If I need to find something I just tap the "Win" key to open the Start Menu and then I just start typing my search query.

It'll default to searching in 'Apps' (everything in your Start Menu) but you can select another location on the right hand side.

Search in Start Menu

Right, and I've been doing that since Vista; I'm fine with the whole start screen because I'm usually only in there for a couple of seconds because of quick searching. With the filtered search (and the inability to just have it search everything at once) I'd have to remember to use the appropriate shortcut to start searching (winkey+w/q/f), click on the filter, or remember the non-intuitive keystrokes to change filter after I've already started searching; not cool.
