haremanBut seriously, I ask a questionactually came across a site on 'shrub' while looking for Kerry's military record (I was curious as to where John Kerry served, how long, etc) and found out from a site at least what appeared to be an interesting tidbit of information. That our 'Shrub' may not have completed his Term of service in the military. And all I got in return was "what about Kerry?" and at least one attack on me.

I made an obvservation and not ONE post was about what I said only posts attacking Clinton and Kerry (for the record I did not vote for Clinton either time). It seems that intelligent discourse on certain issues won't happen on that forum but I will still try to ask questions just see the responses.

I will take a God-fearing man motivated to action by the murder of 3000 of his countrymen over a politically maneuvering weasel anyday.

This is the kind of man the world needs. Not a weakling, but a man motivated by the passion of seeing right is done. No matter what the cost. I would have been proud to serve this President. I had the dubious honor of serving Clinton. :rolleyes:

This man has vision, purpose, guts, and a long memory.

Someone had to take this looming problem head on. It isn't that terrorism reacted to an unfair attack. We forced thier hand before they were ready to more damage than they did.

As an American I expect a government that will protect my children, and bring the fight to the scum that are destroying what is left of a great country, and the world. I expect a leader with the guts to go it alone when the weak, corrupt, and pathetic are immobilized with fear.

I am a veteran, and I do not approve of weaseling out of military service. But he sure as hell has made up for it by killing the enemies of The United States of America. I did complete my service. I wouldn't take his job or responsibility for anything in the world. It takes a special, strong man to do that, and hold the line.
