Yep...I've never seen anything so aggressive as those things. Like a spider will walk all over you and not even bite you, you can catch a bee in your hand and it usually won't sting you unless you squish it. Any fireant WILL sting you until you kill it if it simply touches you for ANY reason, even if they are just wandering around and come across your foot like what happened to you. Any other damn insect tries to avoid stuff, but these damn things just go where they please, and anything that moves they sting it.

Hydra...no thats not my arm in that picture, but various parts of my body have looked like that EVERY summer that I lived in Mississippi. In fact I would venture to say that anyone who ventures outside in MS or states around it, gets stung by fireants EVERY summer without fail. And the stings always look like that, or worse. The pain only lasts a minute, and then they itch like hell for about a week.
