The video was a little drawn-out but it was a neat thing to do in a public place.

Some friends of mine including my brother did this little display in a pizza place:

Several years ago, my co-workers and I had a McDonald's cheeseburger-eating contest when they had the 49-cent cheeseburger special. I ate like 5 of them and after that I couldn't eat there for at least 6 months. It was horrid. But in the last year or so I have completely eliminated McDonald's from my list of restaurants to visit.

My record is like 11 hamburgers. That is like the only time that I ate that much of that junk. That was at mcdonalds too, but nowaydays, I don't visit mcdonald's anymore. I just go there for a small ice cream now. KFC all the way

YAY!

Down with fast food imo. It made me fat (yes, my own fault)!

Man, the 49-cent cheeseburgers were worth eating the plastic that they're made of. I went and bought 100 cheeseburgers for $54 (eg, +tax) and lived off that for a week, after which about the last 15 went bad...

What's really sad is I didn't get fat, which made a number of people jealous.

By the way (this is totally out of the blue), the sensors on those Super Shot games (eg, the basketbal game in your movie clip's background) are a royal pain in the ass to calibrate.

My record in one sitting was 18 cheeseburgers... Me and a few buddies order 50 of them, and only had half of one left over, none of us could get it down, LOL

I could barely move after that, and I don't think I ate anything for like a week afterwards

Speaking of eating a ton. I've seen a lot of really skinny people winning these eating contests - they're like in the 125-150lb range and they're eating more burgers and hot dogs than 300+ pound former record holders.

How do they pull it off? Where does all the food go? I mean, the sheer volume (even compressed) of the food has got to be enormous.

I was going to post a photo of a starving African child to prove my point, but I couldn't bring myself to.

The McDonalds dollar menu got me though college . Now even the thought of eating there makes me want to vomit.
