does anyone actually use these successfully?

i was on black-cell.net marathon yesterday, and GDI kept mammoth tank rushing unsuccessfully, even though they had about 3 or 4 mammys per rush.

these rushes were countered mainly with light tanks, stealth tanks, and mendozas. they had quite a few rushes, and i was in the same light tank for each rush.

ssso then, are these really powerful, or were the drivers just n00bs?

Like any unit they need to be bought at the appropriate time, retards in large public games will see they have 1500 credits and think that they will be invincible in their big tank - the result is a huge slow target that will get destroyed almost instantly.

Get a Mammoth tank sat on the Nod airstrip though and you succesfully stop vehicle production whilst blasting a building/racking up kills with your tusk's up close and personal.

Basically, mammoths are good when base defense are down - and much easier to use on open spacious maps with multiple entry points in to the enemy base.

Important to remember that cannons have a longer range but do less damage, tusks home and do more damage but should only be used at close range.

Also, I never get out of a mammoth to repair once I have bought it (unless I am in a very safe location), you can't see around the thing well enough to spot thieves and it will make you an instant target for snipers/your tank a target for sbh tank stealing nubs.

Mammoths are devastating in the right situation. 90% of public server players do not know what the right situation is, which is why mammoths have a reputation for being useless.

On Hourglass, Nod was pounding us. Eventually, I guess everyone grew desperate. There were like 7 mammoths in a line across the entrance to our base. A wall of pure tank-shell and rocket-fire spewed forth destroying waves of artillery. (I wish I had remembered to save that screen-shot.)

I think the fun of the mammoth is finding that right situation, when you successfully pull off a mammoth rush it really is invincible, when base defences go down and all you can hear is tusk fure and a re-assuring boink - TS is good for this.

just before, i was nod on hourglass, and there was only the wf left on gdi; guarded by a mammoth tank and various infantry. so i got a light tank purposely to destroy the mammy. it went sucessfully, and surely enough, about 2 - 3 mins after destroying it, a beacon was placed that destroyed the wf.

I never get them because they are to slow and take up to much room. Even if I agree to go on a mammy rush I get a med or just ride as a hotwire. The cool thing about a mammy rush is following close behind, crouched down repairing. While the obelisk is shooting all around you.

C&C_Canyon is the absolute best place for mammies. When the Airstrip and/or Ref is down, Nod doesn't have that many tanks to counter with. A mammy could sit in the base entrence and use it's tusks to pointwhore the Hand Of Nod.

I secured the MVP with 11000+ points. The next guy after me had 3100ish.

Picture to prove it. Although it doesn't compare with the round where I got 11k points, I would've gotten at least close if the round didn't end so fast. This was taken less than 30 seconds before the round ended.

Notice how my score towers everyone elses.

If you get the strip or ref down on Canyon, then it is much easier to apc/nuke them down. But that won't get you 11k points ofcourse, it'll just give you a quick win...

Tusks won't reach as far as the shells. I doubt you'd be able to hit the Nod base from the GDI base with them.

My favourite use for mammoth tanks is to defend the base with. They aint quick, but on maps where you can see the enemy coming before they get there (IE Hourglass, Siege) you can usually smash a few of them up before they even reach the AGT.

A cool thing about Mammoths is they out-damage teched Arties. Artillery have longer range, but they are often shooting you within Mammoth range (which is quite long), because of level design.

I generally prefer fighting at range, so the cannon serves me pretty well most of the time. Plus, I like the constant stream of fire you get. But the Tusks do tear up pesky infantry who like to get right up to your treads.

Tusks do more damage than the cannons, and have the same rate of fire. Only disadvantage is they travel slower and have shorter range. Still, whenever my target wanders into tusk range, I always switch.

Tusks are also harder to aim because they are farther to the sides and don't always curve the way you want them to. I'll use them when appropriate, but usually try to stay far enough away to pound with the cannons.

When people are RIGHT up close to you though you have to use the cannons though.. Generally with using the tusks not many people get a chance to get up close to you though.

A tech doesn't have enough C4 to destroy a full-health mammy single handedly, at least not when you take the heal-up-to-half-health thing it has. Most likely you'll have a mammoth tank at 2 health slowly healing it's way back up and a driver laughing at you.

If you put 2 timed as quickly as you can, and then your remotes, and then blow your remotes just before your 2nd timed blows up, the healing to half-health thing won't even take effect and the mammy will die..

i say mammoth tanks are perfect for pushing enemy units back to base to defend. my first reaction when i c a mammoth rush aproaching my base i do what ever it takes to destroy them, so if u get 2 mammoths to fake a rush by getting them to stop just outside the enemies base (shoot at buildings to get them panicing and defensive) nd provide cover for lets say 3 or 4 meds nd apc/ion that would actually rush the base

It's big and slow, but it's a tank, and therefore can take a lot of beating before going down. It takes more C4 to kill a mammoth than it does to kill a building. A Mammoth's Tusk Missles are the best thing in the game to kill a building with, not to meanton that they massacre infantry and vehicules as well. A Mammoth's cannon does more damage than the cannon of any other tank in the game.

Given all that, and the the price is a measly $1500, I'd say it's a steal.

The other advantage of the Mammoth is the nice cover it provides for engineers and other infantry. Two or three Mammoths at the entrance of the Nod base on Under or Field with tech support is enough to bottle up anything in there. Only weakness of that is sniping.

...or the exact same thing for nod... only using arties instead of mammoths. You'd need at least TWICE as much hotwires as there are artilleries, and that's not talking about the idea that if the arties all switched suddenly to a different mammoth, they would have to walk that distance and in that time they'd get killed. Which is besides the point really because all you really need is one or two teched arts in a public to stop mammoth tanks because they won't be able to hit you. (artilleries can shoot the outside of the mammoth tank where as the mammoth tank cannot fire back) Since it's so slow, and so big, this is why generally light tanks, arties, med tanks are better than mammoths. the only real advantages is the tusk missiles (which are pretty horrible range and is sort of useless as tanks are a much more greater threat) Oh, and the double barrel thing is more of a double edged sword, since if you're playing against good people, then if they for some reason aren't very good at shooting the mammoth tank while it takes no damage, they'll still be able to dodge 50% of the shots, because you'd have to be WAY out there to be fired on by both cannons. Which, i guess they could utilize this to their advantage by going out right after the mammoth tank shoots the closer cannon

But unlike Mammoths, artillery is much more vulnerable to infantry weapons, especially Ramjets.

I agree that for the most part Lights and Mediums will get you more bang for your buck, but there are certainly good situations for Mammoths. A Mammoth can be used effectively any time on any map, but the driver must be smart and recognize the limitations.
